

POLITICS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

England so the press reports tell us, the parliament is looked forward to with great interest, and even with anxiety. It is believed that a general election will be inevitable in the coming autumn, and the result will be, it is said, almost a revolution. More than half the members of parliament, if reports be true, are deemed to stand for re-election. This is thought by the administration to be the result of many men and makes a sudden change in the policy and aims in the system of the English government. British conservatism has been largely due to the fact that the same men have been sent back to parliament during long periods. Most of the members have served ten and many twenty even forty years, and from parliament to parliament a majority of the members are unchanged. A conservative may become a liberal or vice versa; or there may be a change in some of the electorates, transferring the majority and administration from the hands of one party to another, but the great bulk of parliament remains the same with the same leaders and the same members.

There is now to be a revolution, we are told. This has been indicated for a great while, and the extension of the election franchises has hurried it up. There has been a strong tendency in the past decade toward democratic ideas. The work of the Irish nationalist is a move in that direction. There has grown up in parliament a new wing of the liberals, almost democratic in their ideas, strong enough to demand recognition from Gladstone and to get it. This movement is accelerated by the extension of the franchise, the abolition of much of the old system through the franchise, and the substitution in its stead of representation by population almost identical with that in the United States. It is doubtful if either of the two great parties in England will again possess an actual working majority in parliament without the aid and assistance of the democratic or radicals, and without some surrender to the latter. Even the conservatives see this, and propose to make the coming campaign on democratic lines, while, as for the liberals, they have long sought to placate this element by making concessions to it in various ways, and notably by the new franchise bill. But as of course the extent of the franchise bill liberates but not removes the hands of the radical element an instrument of power that may be turned against themselves.

It is said that the old members propose to retire from parliament because they fear this body after the next elections may prove too democratic, and they will wait for the storm to blow over. It is evidently their belief that the present democratic sentiment in Great Britain is merely temporary and will soon disappear and conservative ideas will prevail again. But, in England, this progressive movement is but a turn in the wheel, at least—and they will watch with a view for a restoration of the old parliament composed of rich land owners, squires and the sons of nobility. The tendency toward a more democratic government in England is natural, and will continue as it has continued for years until success crown it, and, if we are to believe the English politicians and leaders, it will make a spring forward in the next election such as democracy has not witnessed in Great Britain since the days of the Long Parliament.

This democratic sentiment may signalize its increase of power by becoming aggressive in fact, as it did in France, as the democratic sentiment of France did in the days of the great revolution. If it takes this direction England may be expected to push her influence and power in many parts of the globe. English democracy may bring on the war with Russian absolutism, which the most conservative tendencies of the present government have so avoided.

HAR NOT YET

Though nothing is really settled as between Great Britain and Russia, yet there is a belief that for the present the war cloud has blown over. The conditions that may produce war are, however, continually present. Russia claims an equal right with England in the occupancy of Afghanistan, and when she gets uncontestedly close to the "key of India" she may expect to hear something more than growl from the English.

Neither England nor Russia is in good condition for war. The virtual failure of the Soudan expedition, the disturbed condition of Ireland, the unsatisfactory relations with the rest of Europe, and the constant worry over colonial affairs, all admonish England that the present is not a favorable time for engaging in a war with Russia. On the other hand, the czar has about as much as he can do to keep his military and revolutionary spirit in check. His policies are surrounded by assassins and intrigues, ready to take advantage of any opportunity to usher in their reign of anarchy and destruction, and he should hesitate to cross swords with so powerful a foe as England.

Notwithstanding these considerations, a rupture may occur at any time, and when once begun may lead to a general continental war. This would be most disastrous in a moral sense, because nations can be engaged at nothing so prettily as destroying one another. But there are compensating advantages even in war, and as a general rule prolonged warfare has a stimulating effect on business. Periods of peace and low taxation in the United States have been characterized by great depression, while the war periods have been just the reverse. The same is true as regards England, which enjoyed her greatest commercial and manufacturing prosperity while waging war against Napoleon. While every right and justice in the world prefer a state of peace and quiet, the present condition of things, there is no doubt that the shock of battle between England and Russia would not an end to the prevailing depression.

PHYSICAL DEVELOPMENT

A great many young people have been seriously injured by indirect efforts to develop their physical powers by gymnastic exercises. Intelligence and common sense are needed in the development of the mind as in the body. The first step in physical education is to develop the mental capacity of the beginner. This subject has been taken up in the right way at the university of Pennsylvania where a competent instructor, who is also a physician, has been secured to take the physical welfare of the students in charge. He begins by carefully examining each student to ascertain the amount and kind of exercise required by his physical condition. Every young man is required when he comes to the instructor's office to strip into an adjoining room and remove every article of clothing. He then carefully weighs, and his weight is noted. The measure of his height, both normal and inflated, his upper arms, forearms, thighs and calves carefully recorded. The strength of his lungs is tested by having him blow in a trumpet with a registering diaphragm—an exercise which proves so fatiguing to the average student that he continues it with great frequency throughout his college course. The strength of his arms is ascertained by compelling him to "pull up" on a bar swinging from a trapeze, so that his chin can be seen above the bar, as many times as possible. His abilities of squeezing or compressing are shown by a watch shaped indicator held in the hand, and his power of lifting dead weight tested by the explosion. The fact should be impressed upon the deluded persons who have been in part taken to the shrinking fund.

A singular feature of the recent battle in Egypt is the presence of women soldiers in numbers among the Arabs. They are said to have fought bravely and numbers of them have been found among the slain. This is an unheard of thing except as regards the famed Amazon and the guard of the Asante king. It is particularly strange among a Mohammedan people, whose policy is to subdue their women. The fact indicates either severity of punishment or a lack of control over their wives. The latter is probably the true reason. The latter is a partial uprising of the popular masses to repel the uplifted malediction and contempt of the prophet. The prophet is held in high esteem by the people, and the strength of his lungs is tested by having him blow in a trumpet with a registering diaphragm—an exercise which proves so fatiguing to the average student that he continues it with great frequency throughout his college course. The strength of his arms is ascertained by compelling him to "pull up" on a bar swinging from a trapeze, so that his chin can be seen above the bar, as many times as possible. His abilities of squeezing or compressing are shown by a watch shaped indicator held in the hand, and his power of lifting dead weight tested by the explosion. The fact should be impressed upon the deluded persons who have been in part taken to the shrinking fund.

"Since the explosions they have been outrageously boycotted," says the ex-leutenant, Stephen J. Meany, of the Irish in England. "They can secure employment only with the greatest difficulty, while the poor houses are filled with my sufficing and destitute countrymen." Such is the effect of these outrages upon the Irish, who have had to give up their only source of income, the result of which is that many of them are reduced to poverty. The strength of his lungs is tested by having him blow in a trumpet with a registering diaphragm—an exercise which proves so fatiguing to the average student that he continues it with great frequency throughout his college course. The strength of his arms is ascertained by compelling him to "pull up" on a bar swinging from a trapeze, so that his chin can be seen above the bar, as many times as possible. His abilities of squeezing or compressing are shown by a watch shaped indicator held in the hand, and his power of lifting dead weight tested by the explosion. The fact should be impressed upon the deluded persons who have been in part taken to the shrinking fund.

In addition to a Sunday dinner to some of his friends his eighty-third birthday, William Brown, a prominent democrat of Marion county, West Virginia, made a speech saying that now the democratic party had returned to power he was prepared to die in peace. Within a few days he was shot dead in his home while he was eating a piece of meat. The pieces matched in the mouth of January a few years ago, when he was shot dead by a person injured by the explosion. The fact should be impressed upon the deluded persons who have been in part taken to the shrinking fund.
